When I start thinking about a story, a sort of groove is in my head... But when I try to tell someone how it's going to go, I often think, "Ack, that won't work..."

Back when M&S was just developing, I started telling the story to my editor full of confidence. But sure enough, I was only halfway through when I said, "Forget it... It won't work..." That's when my editor got this real look of concern on her face and said, "Nah, you're going to have to try not being so hard on yourself."

It's been like running a marathon in the dark since. I have to thank my readers for reaching out a helping hand and keeping me going. You're the only reason I've made it this far... Here's the conclusion to Echiru's story:

The Story

Play a game that involves a numbered place on the keyboard, and by holding the numbered button you can instantly open a character and their called "Dramatic Personae".

In this stage, users have to open up the keyboard key "W" and hold it for 10 seconds, then immediately afterwards release it. By doing this, players will be able to open up the "Dramatic Personae" window. Once this window opens, users will see a character's face on the screen, and a dialogue box will appear, asking them what they want to do. If the user selects "Open", then the character will open up a new window for them to play with. This window will contain a variety of items, such as weapons, armor, and other useful items. These items can be used to help the player in their quest for victory.
